The Effect of Corruption on Energy Security and the Analysis of Outlying Countries in East Asia

Abstract With annual data for 2010-13 from fifty-five countries, we explore the possibility that differences in corruption are causal to differentials in energy security. For the purpose of policy formation diagnostic double-checkings are conducted to evaluate all the models in the sense that the more tests that are carried out, the less the chance of accepting a poor model. Among those performed are: the RESET tests for functional form misspecification and the tests for heteroskedasticity. The fixed effect (FE) estimates suggest that corruption has a detrimental effect on energy security. It is also evident from the Spearman rank correlation coefficient that corruption and ene...
